Influence of thermal pre-treatment on the release of phenolic compounds in extra virgin olive oils. Several studies have been carried out to analyze the effect of food processing and thermal treatments on the level of phenolic compounds in olives, their products and oils. However, the influence of thermal treatments and olive oil extraction on the phenolic content of olive oil, in terms of its nature and concentration, has not been previously addressed. In this study, olive oils were obtained from olives untreated or subjected to different temperatures (100, 150, 170 and 180 degrees C). The free and bound phenolic content of olive oil was determined, and a clear increase of phenolic content, regardless of the phenolic class, was obtained after pre-treatment at 100 degrees C. This increase could be explained by the opening of the cell wall due to the lignification process of olive tissues that takes place after pre-treatment, whereas the higher temperatures applied led to higher losses of olive oil phenolics. Trolox equivalent antioxidant capacity (TEAC), total polyphenolic content (TPC) and total flav
