Q: How do I know if an asp.net mvc view is being rendered on the server My situation is like this: I have a View(viewName) that has a ViewModel. In my action method I want to call a special model with that ViewModel, and have it passed to that view (resulting in a ViewModel). If I could determine that the view is being rendered on the server I could just move the model inside the view and everything will be done for me. Thanks. A: This is how: First of all, there's a specific concept to MVC apps: the concept of a View being "done". As you mentioned in the comment, once a view is done with a controller, it is returned to the browser, and a separate process is used to actually send the contents of that view to the browser. The separate process is called, simply, "the view engine". The view engine has the "view" being rendered as one of the tasks it performs. The view engine might actually perform many other tasks as well, but it is essentially a dispatcher - and it is also responsible for generating scripts. That is, the view engine is responsible for making sure that all the views are compiled, and are ready to serve up. The view engine may compile a script with the same name as the view, so that it 1cb139a0ed
