Among other things, the law requires these agencies to submit annual reports on goals and expectations for meeting that objective and on the achievement of such goals and expectations. The Government Performance and Results Act (GPRS) also required the President to submit an annual report to Congress by the fifth day of January. GPRS The GPRS is a comprehensive and far-reaching law that requires government agencies to develop performance plans and annual reports that cover the following: Management of agency operations Strategy, tactics and priorities Performance measurements and methods Strategies for improving performance Implementation and results of agency performance Evaluation To evaluate its performance, each agency is required to evaluate its own performance and the performance of sub-agencies that are reported to the department. Agency reports are also evaluated by the General Accounting Office. Evaluation reviews are done on the basis of the relevant laws, regulations and executive branch directives and on executive branch regulations that are applicable to the evaluation. Principal Program Elements The following are the principal elements of the GPRS, the essence of all performance plans and performance measurements: Management of Agency Operations Strategy, Tactics and Priorities Performance Measurements and Methods Strategies for Improving Performance Implementation and Results of Agency Performance Presidential Performance and Results Act The President is required to submit to Congress an annual report of executive branch performance. The report is to include an evaluation of the following: Strategy, tactics and priorities Performance and results 570a42141b
