Article Title Authors Abstract All automation and semiautomation of work has the potential to negatively impact workers' health and well-being, and to affect the pace of work, which influences the pace of life. The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics's health barometer 2007 reports that the rate of work-related injury and illness among private sector workers is 4.0 per 100 full-time equivalent employees, which is the second-highest rate in the 26 years the survey has been conducted. A 2004 National Institutes of Health study found that an employee's health is one of the three most important factors in determining the pace of work.1 The New Jersey Division of Labor, in New Jersey's

Occupational Safety and Health Act, defines an injury or illness as occurring when a worker is exposed to a risk that could result in or cause harm to the worker.2 The Division defines a health hazard as: "Work which involves a risk to a worker's health and safety of employment which is reasonably likely to cause harm to the worker."3 This risk can be related to work process factors or work environment factors.4 A hazard can have a short-term or long-term health or safety impact. While occupational health hazards are a part of the job, any condition that may have a negative effect on worker health or safety is considered to be part of an employee's health and safety of employment. The employee may be able to take measures to mitigate the hazard, such as adjusting machine controls or replacing protective equipment. In addition, the employer may have a responsibility to take immediate action to prevent the injury or illness that may result from the occupational hazard. The employer's responsibility includes providing and maintaining a safe and healthful work environment. Section 11(c) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act (Act) in 29 U.S.C. 661 states that an employer who does not provide "and maintain in each place of employment adequate safety and health protection programs and practices that are consistent with those standards, will be considered to have violated the requirements of this chapter unless he demonstrates that he had no knowledge of such violation or that after [immediately] acquiring such knowledge, he took all reasonable steps within his control to remedy the situation."5 The Division sets forth the health protection responsibilities of the employer and the employee in terms of the ability to be informed about hazard recognition, implementing and maintaining a safe and healthful work environment, and providing a safe work environment for employees. Regarding the employer's responsibilities, the Division states
