I've installed phpMyAdmin and got a local MySQL database configured. When I connect to the database and simply create a table it seems to be using the root user by default. I then created a different database and a user for my php application. So is it safe to use a database between my local and the actual hosting server? I've been reading about possibly using some type of remote access control. A: I'm not entirely sure which user is used for entering data into a database. MySQL doesn't have users that you can log into. Users exist within the database, not within the application. So you can write a database user of any name that you want. And the MySQL server will be able to look up the name of the database user and connect to that database user if you specify "the name of the database" as the host and user. So is it safe to use a database between my local and the actual hosting server? Yes, MySQL does not have any security as far as I can tell. All of the hostname or IP address doesn't matter. MySQL is a SQL database, not an OS or HTTP server, and it only has three user accounts: "root", "replication", and "system". The replication user allows you to add replication slaves to your MySQL setup, and the system account allows you to create views and stored procedures. You use the replication user to connect to the server so that your app can connect to it and perform inserts, updates, or queries. And the system account is essentially disabled and "silent". You can't delete anything from the system account. A look at the infrastructure behind online poker - e79caf774b
