Ain't Nobody! is a multiplayer sci-fi real-time tactics game by Piranha Games. It is based on MechWarrior 3 and Valve's online game, Team Fortress 2. It is free, available for Windows and macOS and requires the Steam overlay. The gameplay is similar to that of Team Fortress 2, but the units and weapons are all mechs in the MechWarrior 3 universe. The player controls a mercenary and will take control of different mechs with different stats, chassis, and weapons, in the same way that Team Fortress 2 players choose between different classes of characters and items. The player will be able to customize and configure the mechs they control with parts they find or unlock, all while playing the game in an online or LAN setting. The game has six maps at launch, with more to be released after its initial release. The maps are inspired by classic 40K maps and some of them are based on the rules of the game. It therefore is well-settled that a jury should not be instructed that the defendant has a burden to bring forward any evidence or to prove innocence, or that the defendant's failure to testify is an admission of the truth of the charges against him. This court reasoned that the instruction in Sumrall stood in contrast to the instruction in Singer because, unlike the instruction in Singer, the instruction in Sumrall "stated with certainty that the defendant had the burden to disprove guilt." Id. at 94. Since in Sumrall the language was clear and unequivocal, the instruction was not susceptible to a construction that placed on the burden of proof such a burden did not exist.
