Reading film history - or not so much reading, but collecting and researching all that information - really helped me to understand a lot more about the films and who's who. (I have always been a film buff, but I was a lot more open minded about it when I was young.) Also, I would say that at the time I chose to pursue psychology, I was so fed up with the fact that I would only be able to get as far as starting a psychology degree and not pursuing a post-graduate degree or anything like that. So I always used to think that to be a decent writer, you needed to get a degree as well! I understand what you mean, by that, because I was one of those people who would only consider going to university if I knew I was going to get a graduate degree, but I guess what you were saying was that, if you're passionate enough, you can carry on regardless without a degree. I agree with both of these, but I don't agree with the part about being 'passionate enough' to carry on regardless. Sure, you can do it without a degree, but it's much easier without a degree. I'm not trying to discourage you at all, but I guess what I'm trying to say is that you should at least ask yourself if getting a degree is what you want - if you're passionate about what you're doing, it can be easier to do without a degree if that's what you want to do. I actually went to university for Psychology and Soci
