, Gamescom 2012 This week Gematsu has a few interviews, with the likes of Zipper Interactive, 2K Games and Creat Studios. Even though these interviews talk a lot more about political issues than people like myself enjoy on a regular basis, they are a good thing to get a feel for what the future of games holds. Here are that number of our roundups. Dead Island: Escape Gamescom 2012 - Day 7 So far, I've written articles for Dead Island: Escape and details regarding its largest publisher, Deep Silver D3. Dead Island: Escape - Get to the Point First off I have to start talking about the stateside release date. According to the ESA, the American release for Dead Island: Escape is set for September 14, 2012. The stateside map is called "Dead Storm Island", but I'll call it Extreme Island for short. It's actually made to appear as a completely different island, but from the CryEngine map editor, it has the exact same pattern. Basically, it's located in Costa Rica, as seen in the image below. As for who I interviewed for this article, the guide was on the designers of Deep Silver D3, Christoph Hartmann and Katja Olivera. I, then, moved to talking about Deep Silver D3, as we've already received some info regarding it. In this interview, Hartmann talks about how it was, and why Deep Silver wanted to work on it. Moving to Zipperto begin with, I interviewed Christoph and Katja for some interior info regarding Extreme Island. Moving on to the visuals, I had a bit of a chat regarding them with Sven Reemtsma. Next up, it's another interview with Deep Silver D3's artist Jay Fetterman. In a short bit of time, I got a look at the build of the new map. Slippin' down to the last interview, this one was with Rich Siegel from the site for Crypt of the Necrodancer. They made some about portal-based gameplay where players create and destroy, which is made to be done remotely from server. There was also some exploration into MFE's vision of the future, which seemed to be a shared vision of client and network. Moving on from there to an interview with Patrick Söder
