Bravesoft Private Airplane Mod.. I have been testing a good number of helicopters on this simulator for a number of years. The decisions of the Kuwaiti top court on the fate of two female Iraqi detainees were made with some ambiguity, but the judgment itself was clear: The lawyers representing these women had to prove that their clients still were in Iraq. Since these two detainees were tortured while in Kuwait, the court said that proof of whether they would remain in Iraq could only be gained from those responsible for their detention, which in this case included Iraqi government representatives. But since the ruling was handed down, there has been further uncertainty. A group of international human rights organizations and several politicians from the United States and Canada have been calling for the return of these two women. Their pleas have been ignored. So the two women found themselves being held in detention by Kuwaiti authorities for the second time in two weeks. One was snatched from the court grounds on Friday by unidentified men wearing police uniforms. She was apparently returned to Iraq, and the whereabouts of the other woman are unknown. The Kuwaiti government has steadfastly refused to say if the two women being held in Kuwait are still in Iraq. They have not been charged with any crime. On Tuesday, Human Rights Watch joined in the protest organized by several women's groups in Kuwait and the United States. The groups also are planning to hold a demonstration on Wednesday in Baghdad, where the women are from, saying that they are still in Iraq. The Iraqi government could have been prepared for such a protest and a demonstration in Baghdad by sending a high-level delegation to Kuwait. The Iraqi foreign minister, Hoshiyar Zebari, could have even gone himself. Instead, the government declined to comment on the matter and has not made clear whether the women are still in Iraq. This is becoming a familiar pattern. The Iraqi government has all but ignored the plight of its female citizens for years. Yet when they speak out, their protestations fall on deaf ears. In Iraq's systematic rape of its women, female activists have been frequently branded as traitors. Only occasionally, as in the case of two women who were tortured in Abu Ghraib prison in 2004, have they been able to get public attention, despite the government's countless attempts to silence them. Now the Iraqi government's blatant flouting of international law has come back to haunt it by jeopardizing their lives.
