public schools under the bus Today the Trump administration released its fiscal year (FY) 2018 request to Congress. The request will set the stage for a contentious appropriations process and bring about further budget cuts to many domestic programs. Among the highlights of the overall request are a reduction in the Department of Education's budget (which is a mere 5% reduction from current spending, excluding inflation) and a dearth of increases to funding for Title IV grants that go to struggling districts. Less money for Title IV means less money for students. The request also includes an overall budget cut to the Department of the Interior (plus a 1.6% inflation adjustment), of which K-12 education is a significant part of. The recommended fiscal year 2019 budget for the department's Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) is $1.1 billion. This year's proposed budget for BIA is a 7.7% reduction from current spending. You can see where this is going. The only "slowdown" in tribal education, so to speak, has been the slow and steady erosion of federal funding to schools on the reservations, while the population of Indians has exploded. One of the most interesting aspects of the request is the proposed cuts to community and technical colleges. This, too, could have a serious impact on Native American K-12 education. As a general rule, congressional appropriations must be based on the formula laid out in the Higher Education Act. This formula grants federal support

We investigated the effects of methoxyflurane anesthetic on high-energy phosphate metabolism in diaphragm muscle of female Sprague-Dawley rats. The diaphragm muscles were excised at the end of the experiment. Phosphate contents of diaphragm muscle were elevated after the exposure to 300 ppm methoxyflurane for 50 minutes. The levels of creatine phosphate, ADP and ATP, as well as lactate dehydrogenase and isoenzymes patterns of lactate dehydrogenase were also significantly affected. The effects were almost recovered with the removal of methoxyflurane. These results suggest that diaphragm muscle may be utilized as an index for detecting and evaluating the anesthetic effect of methoxyflurane.We use cookies to personalise content and to analyse our traffic.
