Thermal transport properties and energy transport mechanisms of nanoparticles (NPs) on carbon nanofibers (CNFs) were investigated for the first time in a thermally and electrically conductive elastomer matrix. We present a phenomenological model to describe the energy transport through NPs-on-CNFs in which the NP structural properties are identified by testing the model against the experimental data at very low NP volume fractions ($\Phi = 0.15$). The energy transport mechanism of NPs-on-CNFs is validated from the linear analysis of the thermal transport properties. The simulation results show that the NPs are strongly
