The invention pertains to devices such as syringe needles, used to administer a medication or drawing blood, and catheters, used to withdraw blood. In the prior art, syringes and catheters have been used for drawing blood, administering medications and/or with irrigation fluids. Both syringes and catheters have been used in conjunction with a blunt cannula or trocar which must be inserted into the patient to pierce the skin. The cannula is then manipulated to carry the medication into the patient and/or to provide irrigation for wound sites or muscle. In the prior art, blunt cannula and trocar are used to pierce the skin and to communicate with an interior passageway of a catheter or syringe. During administration of medication or infusion, air enters the catheter or syringe. This is undesirable because the air trapped within the catheter or syringe increases the risk of infection. U.S. Pat. No. 5,695,475 (Reilly) discloses a blood collection set which has a blunt cann
