We report a case of life-threatening bradycardia following neoadjuvant chemotherapy with carboplatin and docetaxel for HER2+ breast cancer that was corrected by administration of trastuzumab, pertuzumab and atropine. Four years after initial diagnosis, a 50-year-old female had a partial mastectomy and axillary clearance and was referred to our institution for completion surgery and neoadjuvant chemotherapy. Before the surgery, she had 2 mg/kg carboplatin and 40 mg/kg docetaxel every 3 weeks. Three days before the surgery, she received 1 mg/kg trastuzumab and 5 mg/kg pertuzumab infusion as part of a 3-day course of neoadjuvant chemotherapy. On day 1 of this course, she developed an episode of severe bradycardia (heart rate: 38 beats/min) and became hypotensive. Skin examination was unremarkable. She was admitted to our hospital and was treated as suspected cardiotoxicity. Atropine (0.5 mg) was administered, but her heart rate continued to decrease (27 beats/min). She was transferred to our intensive care unit. Blood was drawn to test for other possible causes of bradycardia, and methemoglobin levels were measured immediately. Her blood pressure stabilized by increasing doses of atropine and noninvasive positive pressure ventilation, but her heart rate remained between 30 and 35 beats/min. In addition, her methemoglobin level was extremely high (21.2%; reference range, 0% to 1.3%) and remained high for 3 days. She was treated with intravenous hydration and 5-10 mg daily atropine. On day 3, her heart rate rose to 70 beats/min, her methemoglobin level dropped to 2.8%, and the dose of atropine was reduced to 0.1 mg. Her heart rate continued to rise to 100 beats/min and remained stable for 1 week. A consultation by the cardiology department was undertaken on day 7, and she was discharged on day 10 after admission.

No major complications occurred
