This was compounded when it was found that this unsupported version also affected a number of Windows 7 machines. As part of the next-generation Windows Server 2009, Microsoft significantly overhauled the management infrastructure of the OS, and with it, the PowerShell remoting capabilities were given the ability to reach out to other nodes within the server infrastructure. Many clients, including PowerShell, do not work against the Windows 2003 Server, and thus it can be difficult for administrators to view and make changes to the underlying configuration of the operating system. When asked by Channelworx, Microsoft officials stated that Windows Server 2008, as well as Windows Vista and Windows 7 clients, will continue to receive updates for the next three years. These updates will cover not only security patches for bugs in the OS, but also will deal with stability issues. Likewise, Microsoft.NET Framework 4.0 support will also continue as long as Windows Server 2008 is receiving updates. At the moment, Windows Server 2008 does not support.NET Framework 4.0 at all, and thus if you were using the OS and you wanted to take advantage of the.NET Framework 4.0 capabilities you had to either force.NET Framework 4.0 to be installed or wait until a future release for Windows Server 2008.
