I'm creating a web page that has around 90 assets that users can interact with. The problem is that I need to be able to download this page using just 20kb and therefore having too many assets is wasteful. Is there a way to reduce the number of assets so that I have more efficiency in downloading the page? Many thanks in advance! A: There are a number of factors in the decision to use fewer assets. First, size is a factor. Larger files require more bandwidth, more transfer time, more storage space, and more time to download. Next is convenience. If the assets are big, they are more cumbersome to use and require more time to download and use. Big assets also make the browser window larger, so the user has to scroll more. These are all things that drive poor user experiences. Lastly, content is king. I've seen sites that have so many assets that there are no interactable things on the page. In these cases, the page is essentially a navigation map for the site. In your case, it's not clear whether the page is navigation or something else. Do you have a dedicated purpose for the page? Is it a static, promotional-only page? Can you simplify it? (Think: Does it need a navigation map?) There are a number of things you could do to make the page more workable. Consider a flexbox layout. You may need some style work to make it look good, but having a clean, traditional-looking layout that works in all browsers is worth it. Doing this will reduce the number of assets needed to deliver the page. It may be that it only takes 20kb, in which case you don't have to worry about it. I have
