This tool let's us control the services whether to be stopped/started, checked for updates, or shut down, all while in the SvcConfig utility. All of these services that you name from the tool are actual running services, this application knows how to use a customized batch file to control the execution of each service and also does a registry change. This is very useful for system administration, it's definitely worth checking out. I can honestly say I never would have heard of Service Controller Pro before, but after installing it I can see why so many people would choose to use it. It makes a lot of the maintenance aspects of a machine super easy, for example it can add services to the list of services that a machine starts when you turn it on, or it can remove the services that you don't need. There are a lot of tools out there that can control a service, but this is the only one I've seen that can do this with an easy to use interface that shows you a list of currently running services. I've been using it to make sure my computer stays running smoothly and I haven't had any problems with it.Q: Trying to receive data from form field (no jquery) I am trying to take some data out of a form field that I have created with the following code: and then place it in a field where I can then do stuff with it, for instance... `$("#newsletter").val()` it works, but... `$("#newsletter").val()` does not work. I would like it to, just not sure why it isn't. I
