Unfortunately, that also applies to Photoshop's dark room processor. Adobe has said that any of the in-app options will work in Photoshop, but that's not quite true. I have tried using the dark room off the iOS app, and I only get decent results when I apply it with the app and choose to convert my images to the JPEG or RAW formats with the camera capture options. This is probably to be expected, since the iOS app is missing the biggest advantages of a proper desktop app. That being said, with the app, you can shoot in pretty much any available ISO setting, which is a boon. Many cameras are capable of going as high as 6400 ISO in RAW mode, and having that natively available for your images is fantastic. The app also lets you set two image profiles for dual-camera shooting - one for the front and one for the back. The dark side is that you still have to add comments, ratings, and comments to images. The UI isn't much different and has looked that way for a long time already. I hinted on my review for the new version that the image previews were a bit slow regarding a preview of the raw data of the preview image. Such a preview should be available in the LWUIT's preview cache. However, with the alpha version of Lightroom 5 it is not (at least on my machine). Another minor issue is that the Advanced section changes the name of the file of the originals which isn't much of a change. And there's also the issue that if you show a preview of a RAW file, the program doesn't switch back and forth whereas the original looks different from a JPEG file. And there's a minor (and easily removable) bug that crops the entire image when you try to crop too early. All in all though, performance was slightly better in the version 5.0.5. There's a memory leak I don't think in the images section on my machine but I don't know if that's also true for this version.
